Career summary: Craig Hogan is a Professor of Astronomy and Astrophysics at the University of Chicago, and Director of the Fermilab Center for Particle Astrophysics. He earned his Ph.D. in 1980 at the University of Cambridge under Martin Rees, and after postdoctoral study at Chicago and Caltech, held faculty positions at the University of Arizona and the University of Washington, where he also served as Vice Provost for Research. Hogan's research has spanned a wide range of cosmology, from theoretical studies of the early universe to planning and implementation of observational programs designed to measure cosmological parameters, element abundances and gravitational waves. He is currently Director of Fermilab's Center for Particle Astrophysics, and is pursuing an experimental effort at Fermilab make the first measurements of quantum behavior of spacetime at the Planck scale.
